THE MONITOR'S STORY

The existence of the famous Monitor built by Ericsson was brief but glorious. She was the first irenclad of her type or of revolving turnet. After several rebuffs and refusals of proposed ironclads the government finally awarded a contract to Ericason for a shot-proof craft to cost $275,000, but it was specified that it must have additional masts and rigging. Eriesson did not heed the contract's requirement solely on steam. Work was rushed, discontinued. and on January 30, 1862, after only 101 working days, the Monitor was ready long and 41 feet wide. In the middle of the centhis the revolving turret was built. It and other slang is plentiful.

vas made of 8-inch iron, was 9 feet high and 21 feet in diameter. It contained two 11-inch guns, each throwing a 189-pound solld shot. The Merrimac threw shells. On the trial trip, on February 19, the Monitor proved a dismal failure, but the energetic Ericsson quickly remedied the defects, and on March 4 a successful trip was made. She then journeyed to Hampton Roads, riding a severe storm and nearly foundering. The vessel was flooded, as her deck was built only one foot above the fall into the hands of those of his own water, and for a time the fires were people who might hereafter come to gather out. PART XI. It was 10 o'clock at night before Jack Norris sat down at his desk to write what he believed was to be his posthumous dispatch. He knew that after his death the good people of Pelesu would seek to justify the murder by the fabrication of some lying story, which should attribute to the event causes wholly disconnected with pol itics; wherefore it was absolutely neces-sary, from his point of view, that a true record of events should, sooner or later,

When the dispatch had been drafted, revised and finally signed, Norris began a letter to his mother. He told her the facts of the position in which he then found himself, of the certainty he felt of dath on the morrow, and wound up with a few simple words of love and thankfulness for her sweet love to him. He added a word or two of sorrow for the grief his death would bring, but he was conscious all the time that he accounts the despendent upon to grant carbon the freedom.
